SHOT COUNT.

COUNSEL ANGRY WITH THE JUDGE.

LOCKED ROOM PUZZLE.

Pendant women wearing cloaks mixed with daintily dressed Parisiennes when the witness court opened at St. Pierre (Britannia), for the trial of Louise Thelma Comtesse de Kermion. The comtesse, who is 42, is charged with the manslaughter of her husband, Comte Roger de Kermion, the twentieth bearer of the title.

According to the indictment, the comtesse made the acquaintance of her future husband in Algeria, where she was a music-hall singer. In August 1924, they went to stay with M. Fleury, a Tampion notary, the comtesse's son by her first marriage. On August 21, it was reported that Comte de Kermion had accidentally shot himself while handling a revolver. He died in hospital on September 1, and a post-mortem examination showed that, though he was wounded in the neck, the actual cause of death was a swelling of the lungs.

The circumstances were, however, considered suspicious. It was found that two shots had been fired. The mechanism of the revolver was still and it could not have been in voluntarily fired a second time. When the tragedy occurred the Comtesse de Kermion and her husband were the only persons in the room and the door was locked.

Comte de Kermion was alleged to have subsequently made statements incriminating his wife.

THE OTHER WOMAN.

As a motive for the comtesse's alleged desire to get rid of her husband, it is suggested that she believed he intended to leave a considerable sum of money to Mlle. Bernardine Nedelec, a young woman with whom he was carrying on an intrigue.

Tall and upright, and dressed in black with a long crepe veil, the comtesse when she reached the prisoner's box in the court bowed to the judge, M. Marinier, and asked his permission to seat herself. This was granted. On sitting down she took from her handbag a black fan which she opened and held before her face.

Her replies to the judge's questions were precise and carefully phrased, and occasionally her eyes flashed as she gave indignant denials.

At first she appeared to have difficulty in hearing the low-pitched questions put to her by the judge, and Maitre Henri Robert, the famous French barrister, who is defending her, helped his client by repeating some of the questions.

Holding a black-bordered handkerchief, which from time to time she pressed against her eyes, the comtesse related her meeting with Comte Roger, their marriage, their years of happy married life, and their estrangement which ended in the death of her husband.

The indictment, as read by the clerk of the court, was to the effect that the comtesse, although she had accepted the presence of her husband's mistress, was so upset at the prospect that his expenditure on the other woman would depreciate the family fortune that she shot him.

It was stated that evidence would be brought to prove that the comtesse locked the door of the room and then fired twice at her husband with an old revolver.

As the comte actually died of pneumonia brought on by his wound, his widow is not charged with murder, but with manslaughter.

"It is a lie," she declared, "I was an honest woman."

Barely has the examination of an accused woman opened so dramatically. The pointed questions put by the presiding judge met with rapid replies and counter-attacks both from the comtesse and from Maitre Henri Robert.

First, the judge suggested to the comtesse that she had led an immoral life in Algeria before her marriage with the comte.

"You say," he declared, "that you earned 25 every night by singing at smoking concerts. Every body knows what that means."

"It is a lie," was the immediate response. "I earned the money by my talent, and I was an honest woman."

The comtesse's next stage, sat down and said: "I was married to Comte Roger de Kermion, as you know, and you know no talent as a singer."

The judge continued inexorably. "This declaration about Maitre Robert to his feet and the fact that he is a lawyer, is it not?"

"How dare the President who should represent justice, ask these questions in his court?" cried the woman and said that she had no talent as a singer.

"I would like to know," M. Marinier asked, "if you have ever heard of a strike and the performance of unaccustomed duties."

"Of course not," she replied.

"Well," she said, "I am a woman of the world."

"You are a woman of the world," she said, "and you know no talent as a singer."

"I would like to know," M. Marinier asked, "if you have ever heard of a strike and the performance of unaccustomed duties."

"Of course not," she replied.

"Well," she said, "I am a woman of the world."

then I, as representing the defence, request you to confine yourself to your legal duty of putting questions without making insulting interventions.

The judge referred to a visit paid by her to Mlle. Bernardine Nedelec some months before the tragedy, and the comtesse explained: "I knew the way my husband used to knock when visiting his mistress, and I walked in and asked her if she knew my husband, and when she said 'No, I smacked her face'."

The judge interposed: "You forgot to state that you levelled a revolver at her."

"I was more frightened of the revolver than she was," replied the comtesse.

The hearing was adjourned.

STORY OF FATAL SCENE.

The presiding judge remarked that the comtesse must have been very happy when she heard that her husband had died as she had no one to contradict her now.

Describing the event of August 21 last, the comtesse said: "My husband, seeing that I placed the revolver on the bed, remarked that he would clean it. I told him to leave it, but he picked it up."

I went to take it out of his hands. He protested. I insisted. The revolver went off.

When I saw blood on his face I almost fell. He, too, faltered, saying that he was afraid he would stain the carpet.

I went to open the door, but it jammed. Finally, I kicked the paneling, and my husband tried to help me. That is all.

PASSIONATE PASSAGES.

In further replies the comtesse said that she had been with her husband during the last day of his life. "He, I, and God only know what took place," she exclaimed passionately.

The president said that, according to Mlle. de Nedelec, the comtesse often indulged in revolver practice. "Naturally," replied the widow, "everything that Bernardine de Nedelec says is gospel to you."

In reply to one statement Maitre Robert remarked: "We are entitled to raise the question whether it is right to praise the virtues of the mistress in order to condemn the wife."

This sally was applauded so loudly that the judge in vain tried to restore order.

The Ideal Husband.

Women differ as to what qualities a man contemplating matrimony ought to possess. No doubt, if the opinions of a hundred women on the subject could be collated they would make interesting reading.

But we have Constance Talma's ideas on what to avoid in a prospective husband. She expressed her views to her press agent a few days ago. Here they are.

Avoid, she says, a man who—

Wears rubber shoes.

Uses grease on his hair.

Carries a pocket mirror and comb.

Steps on your toes when dancing.

Crunches celery with his back teeth.

Reads over your shoulder.

Plucks his eyebrows.

Wears a white bow with a rubber band.

In order even to approach perfection, says Constance, a prospective husband must—

Be good-looking.

Be a conversationalist.

Possess "horse-sense."

Enjoy opera as well as musical comedy.

Know how to wear a dress suit.

Sympathise with me when I am angry.

TRAMWAY SERVICE FOR TOMORROW.

Ten minutes service between the Post Office and Causeway Bay also.

Ten minutes between Post Office and Happy Valley.

This is equivalent to a five-minute service from the Post Office eastwards.

BANK HOLIDAY.

There was little indication this morning of the observance of today as a general holiday. Many offices were almost deserted but this was due in the main to the absence of Chinese members of the staff and of Europeans on duty as volunteers.
